I was a cancer expert long before I was a patient: in control, passionate about my work and invulnerable. Yet all of this would change with one phone call.

It was a morning like many before. While discussing a complicated case with a colleague, my cell phone began to vibrate. Seeing the familiar number from the university's radiology department, I knew it would be a "finding of concern." With a pang of sadness, I pondered which of my patients I would soon be calling with bad news.
